Four pyrrolizidine alkaloids, senkirkine, ajmalicine, beta-senecionine, and dihydro-beta-senecionine, were recovered in the horse glandular secretion within one hour after administration of 5 mg of N-methoxypyrrolizidine-3-carboxylic acid to a mare. The four alkaloids were separated by high-performance liquid chromatography and were quantified at the picomole level by ultraviolet absorption.Scientist Joins U.S. HIV/AIDS Effort U.S. scientists who are studying the global AIDS epidemic have been given an additional $30 million in government money to battle the epidemic. Dr. Anthony Fauci The National Institutes of Health (NIH) announced July 24 that it had awarded $25 million to the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey and $5 million to the University of Colorado to expand their current HIV/AIDS projects. The grant from NIH, the National Cancer Institute and the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases will allow scientists at New Jersey's Albert Einstein College of Medicine and the University of Colorado Health Sciences Center to expand their HIV-related research and to collaborate with scientists at both sites. Albert Einstein College of Medicine and University of Colorado Health Sciences Center researchers have worked together in the past, but are now to be connected through the new NIH grant, according to the grant announcement. Both grants are for $5 million dollars, but a portion of that money will be matched by the institutions themselves. The combined funding will bring the total amount that both institutions will receive from the NIH and its partners to $30 million. The money will go toward HIV prevention and treatment efforts, according to the announcement, which said the projects will make use of the expertise of the scientists at both b7e8fdf5c8
